Sen. Ray Scott says he's considering a run for governor in '18

Denver Post

Sen. Ray Scott is considering a run for governor in 2018 and would look to bring down the expenses of government to invest in such priorities as transportation, higher education and rural broadband Internet, the Mesa County Republican said Saturday. If he gets in the race and wins, Scott would be the first Western Slope candidate to win the governor's office in 64 years.

Scott, a fiscal conservative, points to "a lot of fat" in state spending, citing the growing costs of Medicaid to a state budget that needs to be managed more conservatively, he said. Scott also would boost the state's economy by supporting responsible energy development. He said he has middle-of-the-road positions on the divisive issues of abortion and state access to federal public lands.

Cadman: Senate Republican goals for the 2016 legislative session

Colorado Springs Gazette

In the 2015 session, Democrats joined Republicans to pass 367 bills to help Coloradans move forward in difficult times. Despite it being an election year, our constituents expect us to continue looking for common ground and working for bipartisan answers to the problems confronting the state.

Today we face a different budget situation than we had a year ago. We see a slowdown in the economy and thus in revenues, and we see some dark clouds on the horizon. Yet, our job as legislators remains the same. We must sort out the many claims on the public treasury and set priorities.

Hickenlooper: Polling shows people would reject move of hospital tax off-budget

Complete Colorado

On January 6, Governor John Hickenlooper spoke to the well heeled and highly influential political organization 'Colorado Forum.' But the governor, his staff, and members of Colorado Forum barred three reporters who showed up from joining the meeting.

Complete Colorado obtained recordings of the remarks and the question and answer session which followed after filing a Colorado Open Records Act request with the governor's office on the same day seeking audio recordings of the governor. The wide ranging discussion touched on the governor's new water plan, the battle over the "hospital provider fee," immigration, oil and gas initiatives, and even the impact driverless cars could someday have on the state.

Colorado's road problems collide at Capitol

Denver Post

The state's transportation problems all collide in one place: the Capitol. And the impact is pushing the perennial issue of state transportation funding to the top of the 2016 legislative to-do list.

Gov. John Hickenlooper and lawmakers are mostly united this session in a mission to find more money for road building and maintenance, but what is less universal is the solution. Democrats and Republicans are moving in opposite directions and struggling to reach consensus on how to find more money - an impasse that is complicated by a state budget crunch.

Bill would gut state funding for mass transit in Colorado

Colorado Springs Gazette

The Colorado Senate is expected to hear the second reading Monday of a bill that would remove up to $5 million from the state transit and rail fund. If Senate Bill 16-011 eventually becomes law, it would repeal the portion of the Funding Advancements for Surface Transportation and Economic Recovery Act (FASTER) that provides grants to local transit agencies like Colorado Springs' Mountain Metropolitan Transit as well as several nonprofits.

Oil under $30 a barrel carries dangers for Colorado economy

Denver Post

The collapse this month in oil prices can't help but unleash some primal fears for anyone who was in Colorado during the mid-1980s. That's when the state suffered a recession so severe that it hollowed out downtown office buildings, triggered the failure of savings and loans and drove thousands to leave for better opportunities elsewhere. Energy-producing states such as Colorado and Texas lagged other parts of the country as the aftermath of depressed prices played out for years.

Oil's price swoon is drilling hard into Colorado schools, communities

Denver Post

Gavin Amen is getting squeezed twice by cratering oil prices. The 17-year-old junior at Platte Valley High School in Kersey is in the family business, Amen Oilfield Service, which has keenly felt the sharp decline in the price of a barrel of oil. The company's yard is filled with equipment that used to be out in the field, setting tanks and cutting pipe for well operations. "It's affecting us pretty hard," said Amen, who sent sparks cascading across the floor as he sliced pipe with a blowtorch flame in his school's shop room last week.

Colorado's traction law used 143 times on Colorado mountain roads

Denver Post

Colorado's traction law was in effect 143 times at various locations on the state's mountain highways between Oct. 22 and Jan. 20 as part of a campaign to unclog traffic through the high country.

The traction law is called into play when snow and ice on the highway make traveling hazardous in the mountains. The traction law requires that motorists use snow tires, tires with the mud/snow designation or a four-wheel/all-wheel drive vehicle to travel. All tires must have a minimum one-eighth-inch tread.

Public money for Colorado kids with disabilities goes toward lobbying

Denver Post

Nearly $600,000 in public funds for people with developmental disabilities instead goes to a trade association whose lobbying at the state Capitol has resulted in a contentious relationship with parents of children with disabilities.

Parents whose young or adult children have developmental and intellectual delays have simmered for years knowing that lobbyists receive a portion of government funds dispensed for therapy, respite care, wheelchair ramps and bathroom renovations.
